The Vancouver Police Museum and Archives will open a new exhibition on Saturday March 3, in honour of the officers and service dogs who have given their lives in the line of service. During the history of Vancouver’s municipal police force sixteen officers and eight police service dogs have been killed in the line of duty. The exhibition will reflect on how we honour police officers from three perspectives - the commemoration of fallen officers by their fellow officers, by their families, and by the public. This exhibition explores how the memories of these individuals have passed through time and will continue into the future.

This exhibition was made possible by the support of the Vancouver Police Foundation.

About the museum:

The Vancouver Police Museum & Archives is an independent museum run by the Vancouver Police Historical Society, a registered charity. The Museum’s foundations began in celebration of the Vancouver Police Department’s centennial anniversary in 1986 and have since expanded beyond the blue lens of local law enforcement to include the history of the Vancouver Coroner’s Services and the historic City Analyst Laboratory that houses the Museum.
